George and Delia McDonald's sixth child was a son whom they named Thomas born 6 September 1842 and baptised on Christmas day of the same year.

He married twice, firstly Priscilla Farman, daughter of John Farman and his common-law wife, the widow Jane Woodhouse.

Thomas and Priscilla were married at Green Hills, River Leven on 10 October 1861. The witnesses were his sister Maria Louisa and her husband James Alfred Fogg, and William Farman who, in all probability is the William Woodhouse who married Catherine McDonald and was the son of Jane Woodhouse by her husband Francis Woodhouse, and thus a half-brother to Priscilla.

Between the years 1862 and 1874 Thomas and Priscilla farmed at the Leven. In 1867 and 1868 the valuation Rolls show them with a house and land (sixty four acres in extent) which may have been Priscilla's father's farm which she was to inherit on his death in 1869.

In 1869 the Valuation Rolls show Thomas on a 50-acre farm owned by William Mason and this situation continued until 1874. In 1875 Priscilla's 64 acres were conveyed to James Alfred Fogg (Thomas's brother-in-law) for £350.<sup>1</sup>

In 1876 and 1877 income came from splitting palings.

In the years between 1882 and 1887 his occupation is that of carpenter, and in 1885 he purchased 51 acres in the parish of Bradworthy near the township reserve of Crawford on the Upper Castra Road, but this is the only year the property appears in the Valuation Roll.<sup>2</sup>

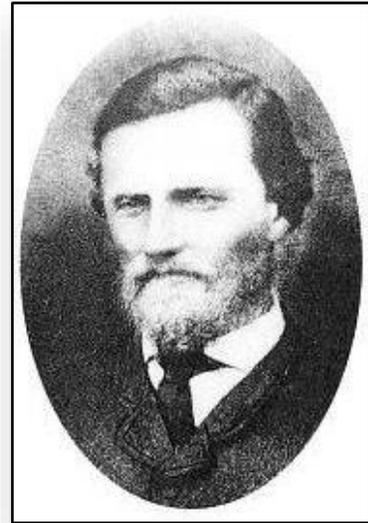

Thomas and Priscilla had seven children: the eldest, Frances, died in 1873 at the age of ten; and their second youngest son, Alexander Ephraim, died of meningitis when six years of age.

Priscilla died from heart disease at Castra Road on 28 February 1887. She was 41 years old.

Around September 1888, eighteen months after the death of Priscilla, Thomas left his youngest boy Claude, then aged six, in the care of the Brooks family. He was away on the West Coast for several years and although Claude was fed and clothed he wasn't sent to school for most of that period<sup>3</sup> as it was too far for him to travel being four miles each way. The Brooks's later took Thomas to court to recover their expenses of £13 16s for forty-six weeks board and lodging. (Brooks said he (Thomas) also skipped off without paying him his due wages.) Claude's uncles, Joseph McDonald and John Sturzaker, also had charge of the boy for a time.<sup>4</sup>

It was not uncommon for the fledgling settler to spend time prospecting for minerals, no doubt in the hope of a find sufficient to pay off the farm and set him up for life. Brother-in-law James Fogg indulged himself and found small quantities of tin, and John Sturzaker involved himself in the Black Bluff gold discoveries of the late 1890s, and both men had their fingers burnt in the Penguin Creek Silver Mine debacle, as did many other locals. So it would be surprising if Thomas did not take up tent and pick while he was working on the West Coast, and as his son Thomas William did, an account of what the prospector could expect is included here:

Many people who are not acquainted with the peculiar characteristics of the Tasmanian bush express surprise that a little island like Tasmania has not been fully explored years ago; a short practical experience of "swagging it" generally makes them wonder that it has ever been explored at all.

Certainly our bush, more especially that lying to the westward, is not a kind country for the prospector, the man who has done the greater part of the exploration of this colony. Standing upon some eminence, from which an extended view of the western country can be seen, the traveller sees before him range behind range, like the petrified billows of some giant sea, gradually fading from their sombre olive-green till they mix with the blue of the sky and disappear. This is the country he has to traverse, loaded with his flour and bacon and tent, too often to have the profits of his labours reaped by others. Seventy or eighty pounds is not an unusual weight for a man to start upon a trip with: as he has to allow at least one pound of flour for each day he is out, besides, his bacon, tent, and tools. Scrambling through the ferns, and over horizontal scrub and bauera with this load is a matter that requires considerable practice, as the tendency of the load is to pitch a man forward upon his nose upon the slightest provocation: and it is not unusual to see a novice dive headforemost over a log, to the general disorganisation of his temper and his swag.

The tools of trade invariably consist of a tin dish, a pick, and a short-handled shovel...when once secured a good shovel is a carefully treasured article. Many a prospector is compelled to abandon his tools and tent, but always saves his shovel, if it is a good one. Many also take a light iron pestle and mortar, with which to test any likely looking stone they may come across. When the whole of the kit and provisions is got together they are generally wrapped up in a tent, strapped at the top and bottom, and fitted to the shoulders with straps, and with this load, the prospector plods away on his journey. Of course any fast travelling is out of the question, and two miles an hour is about the average pace. In many places a mile a day is the maximum distance covered when the bête noir of bushmen, the horizontal scrub is encountered. Its growth may best be explained to those unacquainted with its appearance by asking them to imagine a tangled fishing net bundled irregularly along the ground and then to imagine each string a living stem varying in thickness from a penholder to a man's thigh. If it cannot be crawled under, it has to be climbed over, and sometimes the climber is thirty feet above the ground...Another cheerful scrub encountered is the bauera, an unfailing indication of worthless soil. It is like a horizontal scrub on a very much smaller scale, and consists of a tangled mass of wire-like stems which cannot be broken. The only way to cross it is to keep throwing the pack ahead and keep rolling after it. The prospector has always his eyes open for "indications", such as quartz, granite, slate, and so forth, and as he reaches each creek, he puts down a little pothole in the drift and carefully washes it in his dish...Certainly the life of the prospector is a hard and often an unrewarded one, and no one will grudge him what he may get. To many a one of these lonely wanderers the country is indebted to an extent that is not appreciated for years, and often when the reward does come it is too late.<sup>5</sup>

Returning to life at Castra, we find that Thomas married a second time in 1892.

A marriage notice in the North West Post states the lady was Jane Taylor, late of Surrey, England.<sup>6</sup> She is Jane Jordan, widow, on the marriage certificate. Thomas and Jane were married at Latrobe. From the many stories told of him it would seem that Thomas was a drinking man. One story tells of his getting merry at the hotel in Ulverstone and of his deciding to sleep it off.

While he was sleeping some of his friends tied bullock horns to his head and there was much mirth when he awoke, felt his head and on discovering the horns exclaimed that he 'went to sleep Tommy McDonald and woke a bull'.<sup>7</sup>

Then we have the story told by (the late) James Biddle his grand-nephew of how he and Thomas and Thomas's second wife were travelling into Ulverstone —Jim driving the bullocks and the others seated on top of the load of palings they were bringing in. On this occasion Thomas wasn't the only one with a thirst; the bullocks had one too, and on approaching a creek desire overcame them and they bolted, dashed into the water, and overturned the dray with Thomas and his wife landing in the nearby paddock. Unhurt and undeterred Thomas and his wife walked the rest of the way to Ulverstone leaving Jim to reload the palings.<sup>8</sup>

Thomas died on 24 December 1907 after a short illness.

Of their seven children the third son, Thomas William (Bill), born at River Leven on 28 January 1870, was perhaps the most successful.

The Tasmanian Mail of 10 November 1906 has this to say of his career:

Mr T.W. McDonald, who was elected Mayor of Lower Hutt [New Zealand] on April 20, 1905 and re-elected on April 20, 1906 (unopposed), was born at Castra-road, Ulverstone, Tasmania, in 1869, [sic] and was educated at the State schools there. He started life as a farmer on the late Colonel A. Crawford's estate, Deyrah, where he remained for ten years, during which time much was done to improve his education, by the members of Colonel Crawford's family. Living so long with a military family, Mr McDonald became imbued with the military spirit, and took lessons in drill from the time he was 14 years old until he joined the Tasmanian Auxiliary Force at the age of 17. Private McDonald passed through all the N.C.O. ranks, during which time he won the Crown and Crossed Rifles for best rifle shot in the district of West Devon. N.C.O. McDonald attended the Military School of Instruction at Hobart during two years, on each occasion winning highest honours amongst the N.C.O.'s, and the second year he qualified for lieutenant. Mr McDonald was one of a party of pioneer diggers who first prospected the Mount Zeehan silver fields on the West Coast of Tasmania, and he met with such small success that it wound up with his having to walk from Mount Zeehan to Mount Bischoff, a distance of about 95 miles without anything to eat except a small piece of bread and a tin of Swiss milk. He went to New Zealand in 1893, and proceeded to the East Coast, where he entered into a contract to fell 60 acres of dense bush for 30s. per acre, which engaged his attention for about six months, after which he returned to Wellington, and a little later joined the Permanent Force (now the Royal New Zealand Artillery).

After a course in gunnery he left the artillery and assisted in the formation of the Kelburne Rifle Volunteers, of which he was the first lieutenant for about two years.<sup>9</sup> On another occasion the Mail adds further details, stating that Thomas William:

began his military career in the No. 4 Company of the West Devon Rifle Volunteers auxiliary force as a private and gradually worked up, step by step, until, in 1892, he passed the necessary examination for the rank of lieutenant at the School of Instruction in Hobart.<sup>10</sup>

When in New Zealand he was appointed military drill instructor of the cadets under the jurisdiction of the Wellington Education Board.<sup>11</sup>

In February 1908 he returned to Tasmania by the Marama,<sup>12</sup> from New Zealand, for a short visit whilst Assistant Adjutant-General of the New Zealand Military Forces. On being feted by the Premier of Tasmania, he was quoted as saying that he did not leave Tasmania because he could not live here, but because he thought there would be larger opportunities in New Zealand.<sup>13</sup>

On the 24th he attended a Launceston City Council meeting and the next day visited his cousin Emma McDonald at Perth. The North West Post, Monday 9 March 1908 records that he made an inspection of the trial potato plots a short distance from Ulverstone in the company of the Hon. H.A. Nicholls, Mr W. Henry, the American Consul, and the Premier of Tasmania.

On Thursday 12 March a farewell social was held in his honour at the Sprent Hall. Over two hundred people attended with some coming from as far away as Stowport and Barrington. There was dancing and songs by Miss Moore, Mr Wood, and others, and Mr J. Stalker 'delighted the audience with some selections on the bagpipes'.

The Hon. H.A. Nicholls presented Bill with a gold medal in the shape of a map of Tasmania (with a red stone marking Sprent) and made a 'happy speech':

Captain McDonald who was much affected, briefly returned thanks, and stated he had done nothing to warrant this splendid treatment, as in advancing their interests he had also thought of his own.

After supper dancing was indulged in till a late hour! He left for Melbourne by the Loongana on 17 March, where he was to spend some days in Victoria and afterwards in NSW before returning to New Zealand.<sup>14</sup>

While he was in Tasmania Bill visited his brother Edwin at Stowport and his niece Stella Purton recalls that, 'he brought me a dear little cup with my name and date the year 1908 on it in gold letters it is crystal at the top and ruby.'<sup>15</sup>

Following his involvement with the volunteers he was specially selected for two years attachment to the British Army for higher field training. During this time he kept up his connections with his homeland:

Work has been commenced upon the Commonwealth Government offices in London. Workmen are now busily engaged in excavating for the foundations. Two and a-half years hence Tasmania will be considering whether it is desirable to move the Agency-General from its present quarters in Victoria-street to the Strand. In the meantime, Sir John McCall is busying himself upon current Tasmanian business. The exhibits of wool, minerals, and produce are in place, and look very well in the larger exhibition rooms afforded by the new offices. Sir John McCall, who has been moving his London home, spent the week-end with Major McDonald of the New Zealand Defence Force at Farnborough. Major McDonald is now attached to a leading English regiment, which he has joined in consequence of the new scheme for the exchange of officers between the British Army and the overseas forces. Major McDonald is a Tasmanian by birth, and used to serve in the volunteers on the North-West Coast....<sup>16</sup>

While at Aldershot the North West Post<sup>17</sup> records that he prepared for the examination for the rank of colonel:

This rank he has now brilliantly succeeded in attaining, having passed with distinction in the first division. In military tactics, Colonel M'Donald distinguished himself by securing the highest number of marks amongst the entrants from all over the Empire.

While he was in England Thomas William attended the farewell banquet in honour of Sir John M'Call, Tasmania's Agent-General, which was held in London.

On the outbreak of war Thomas was appointed to command the Otago Battalion of the main body of the New Zealand Expeditionary Force. In September 1914 he was considered fit for service, passing all aspects of the medical examination. He was 45 years of age, and described as being 5 ft 9 inches tall, with brown hair and bluish coloured eyes. He left New Zealand on 15 October 1914 and disembarked at Alexandria on 3 December 1914. However his overseas service was curtailed when a duodenal ulcer was diagnosed whilst in Cairo, Egypt in December 1914 and forced him to be invalided to England and thence to New Zealand for home service in the New Zealand Staff Corps with the rank of Major. Thomas was a member of the United Party in the New Zealand Parliament from 1929.<sup>18</sup>

Bill married a Dunedin born girl, Amy Gertrude Kimbell in Wellington in 1898:

A wedding which attracted a considerable amount of attention took place at St. Peter's Schoolroom this afternoon, the contracting parties being Mr. T.W. Macdonald, [sic] of the Education Board's staff (formerly of Launceston). And Miss Amy Gertrude Kimbell, of the Lands and Survey Department. The bride wore a puce-coloured silk dress, trimmed with cream broche, and a white straw hat, trimmed with ostrich tips and lily of the valley. Miss Maude W. Kimbell (her sister) was bridesmaid, and was dressed in a blue spotted muslin dress and leghorn hat trimmed with ribbons to match. The bridegroom, who was attended by Mr. Kimbell, jun., presented the bride with a gold bracelet and a set of Wedgwood ware, and the bridesmaid with a gold dove brooch. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. W.C. Waters, and at its conclusion, the bridal party drove to Mrs. Kimbell's residence, where a reception was held. The honeymoon is to be spent in the Wairarapa. Amongst the wedding presents were gifts from the Boys' Institute Cadets, of which the bridegroom is captain, and the staff of the Education Board.<sup>19</sup>

They had a daughter and two sons and there are numerous descendants.

Bill died in Wellington, New Zealand on 14 August 1968 aged 98 years.<sup>20</sup>
